Industry Profile

India-based Sahyadri Farmers Producer Co is adopting block chain for food traceability from farm to fork, The Hindu Business Line reported. Sahyadri Farms aims to increase the payout to farmers by improving efficiency and transparency in supply chains.

The company is using block chain to increase transparency in its business. It will use it to provide customers with information such as harvest details and produce quality. Additionally, it shows the money the farmer receives and the costs such as processing, packaging and transport. The customers need to scan a QR code on the product packaging to access the provenance details. While improving consumer trust, the solution enables farmers to get details of where their individual produce went and at what price it was sold. Along with provenance, block chain also ensures the food safety of the products and would help Sahyadri Farms prove its sustainability claims.

IIT-Bombay incubated start-up EmerTech Innovations is developing the blockchain platform. The company's CEO, Gaurav Somwanshi, told BusinessLine that about 15,000-20,000 labels are stuck to produce lots daily and then tracked by the blockchain.
